got a rag doll, and Jo Harper got a hymn book and a pamphlet; and then the teacher came in and made us drop everything and tear it up. I didn't see any diamonds, and I told Tom Sawyer that. He said he had a lot of them there anyway; it's him said there are rabbits there and elephant and stuff. I said because we couldn't see them then? He said that if I hadn't been so ignorant, and had read a book called “Don Quixote” I would know without having to ask. He said it was all done by charms. He said he had hundreds of soldiers there, and elephants and treasures, and so on, but we didn't have enemies who were called magicians, and they they had turned everything into a Sunday school out of spite. I said okay, so what we needed to do was go see the magicians. Tom Sawyer spoke that I was stupid.

“Because,” he said, “a magician could summon many jinn, and they would do you to shreds before you can say Jack Robinson. they are so tall like trees and big as cathedrals.”

“Well,” I said, “Then we better find some geniuses to help us, no? can we take the other part?”

“How are we going to get them?”

"I don't know. What do they call jinn?” “Why, they rub an old pewter lamp or an iron ring, and then the genie comes out along with thunder and lightning around him, along with smoke and all that ask them, they do. They don't hesitate to nip the problem in the bud or attack a Sunday school or whatever.”
“Who makes them destroy everything?”
“For whoever rubs the lamp or the ring has the right to have the genie and make it he do what he wants. If the order is to build a palace 40 miles from tall, diamond and full of chewing gum, or all that, not the six thousand, stupid. I want you to take this; I want to give this to you, the six thousand and all”

He looked surprised. He couldn't seem to get out of it.

He said :

“Because, what do you mean, my boy?

I say, “I don't want you to ask me any questions about this, please.

You'll get it, won't you?”

He says:

“Well, I'm confused. Is that something that matters?”

“Please take it,” I said, “and don’t ask me anything, so I don’t have to.

to lie"

He thought for a while, until he said:

“Well I think I get it, you want to sell me all your property, don't to give. This is correct thinking”

Then he wrote something on a paper and read it aloud:

“Here, you can see it says 'out of consideration', which means I

I bought this from you, and I paid for it. Here's a dollar for you. now sign here."

So I signed and left.

Mrs Watson's 'nigger' Jim had a hairball as big as a fist, that had been removed from the fourth stomach of an ox, and he used it to make magic. He said there was a spirit inside the furball, and he knew it all. Then

I met him that night, and told him I was there again, I had found its traces in the snow. What I wanted to know was what would he do if he will stay? Jim took out his furball and said something about it, and then he stood up and he dropped to the floor. It landed pretty hard and then rolled about an inch. Kim tried to again, but the same thing happened. Jim got down on his knees and placed his ear against his floor to listen. But that was no use; he said he wouldn't talk. he of that sometimes I wouldn't speak without

Go to the kitchen and get some more. I didn't want him to try. I said the Jim could wake up and come. But Tom wanted to risk it; so we went in there and took three candles, and Tom put five cents on the table to pay. So we left, I was in a great hurry to get out of there; but nothing would go to Tom, but he needed to crawl to where Jim was, he crawled on his legs and knees on the floor, and threw something at him. I
I waited and this seemed like a good idea for a while, everything was going well.

As soon as Tom got back, we cut through the garden fence and we quickly arrived over the valley on the other side of the house. Tom said he took the hat off Jim's head and hung on a limb just to his right, Jim shifted a little, but did not wake up. After that Jim said that the witches bewitched him and put him in a trance, manipulated him across the state and then placed him under out of a tree again and hung his hat on a limb to show who had done it. And the next time Jim told him that they manipulated him for New Orleans; and after that, every time he tells me that, he spreads it more and more then, until he said that they manipulated him all over the world and tired him to almost die, his back was full of boils. Jim was extremely proud of that, and he achieved so much that he would hardly notice the other Negroes. blacks traveled miles and miles to listen to Jim's stories, he was more in demand than any other black people in the country, foreign blacks would gape listening to he speak. Blacks are always talking about witches in the dark, in the kitchen by the fire; but when someone was talking like he knew about it, Jim would say “Hmm! What do you know about witches?” and so that nigga felt the pressure and had to be quiet in place. Jim always kept those 5 pieces on a chain around his around his neck, and he always said it was an amulet the devil gave him, with its own hands, and said that he could heal anyone.

Go to the kitchen and get some more. I didn't want him to try. I said the Jim could wake up and come. But Tom wanted to risk it; so we went in there and took three candles, and Tom put five cents on the table to pay. So we left, I was in a great hurry to get out of there; but nothing would go to Tom, but he needed to crawl to where Jim was, he crawled on his legs and knees on the floor, and threw something at him. I
I waited and this seemed like a good idea for a while, everything was going well.

As soon as Tom got back, we cut through the garden fence and we quickly arrived over the valley on the other side of the house. Tom said he took the
hat off Jim's head and hung on a limb just to his right, Jim shifted
a little, but did not wake up. After that Jim said that the witches bewitched him and put him in a trance, manipulated him across the state and then placed him under out of a tree again and hung his hat on a limb to show who had done it. And the next time Jim told him that they manipulated him for New Orleans; and after that, every time he tells me that, he spreads it more and more then, until he said that they manipulated him all over the world and tired him to almost die, his back was full of boils. Jim was extremely proud of that, and he achieved so much that he would hardly notice the other Negroes. blacks traveled miles and miles to listen to Jim's stories, he was more in demand than any other black people in the country, foreign blacks would gape listening to he speak. Blacks are always talking about witches in the dark, in the kitchen by the fire; but when someone was talking like he knew about it, Jim would say “Hmm! What do you know about witches?” and so that nigga felt the pressure and had to be quiet in place. Jim always kept those 5 pieces on a chain around his around his neck, and he always said it was an amulet the devil gave him, with its own hands, and said that he could heal anyone.

To kill, or it wouldn't be fair to others.

Well, nobody thought of anything to do, everybody was surprised, and they were paralysed. I was ready to cry; but suddenly I thought of a way out, and so I offered them Miss Watson, they could kill her. All said:

“Well, she'll do, she'll do. All very well. Huck can come in”

So they all pierced their finger with a pin to sign the paper with a mark of blood.

“Now,” said Ben Rogers, “what is the business side of this gang?”

"Nothing, just robbery and murder," said Tom.

“But who are we going to rob ourselves of? Houses, castles hi...”

"Stuff! Stealing a castle and such is not theft, it is theft.” Said Tom Sawyer

“We're not thieves, that's not our style, we're looters. We we stopped carriages on the road, wearing masks, and killed people and took the your watches and money.”

“Do we always have to kill people?”

"Of course. That's better. Some authorities think differently, but basically killing is considered the best method. Except when who do you kidnap and brings it to the cave until they are rescued.

"“Rescued? What is it?"

“I don't know, but that's what they do. I've seen it in the books; so of course it is that's what we need to do”

"But how can we do it if we don't know what it is?"

“Because so many questions, we HAVE to do this. I didn't tell you that you're in books, you want to do something different from books and screw it up?”

“Well, that’s very easy to say, Tom Sawyer, but how are they going to kidnap if we don't do you know how to do this with them? That's what I mean.

Now you understood?"

"Well I do not know. But maybe if we keep them to the rescue, it means that we hold them until they die”

“Now yes, that is an answer. Why didn't you say this before? We go keep them until they're rescued to death, and what a job they're going to give trying to eat everything and always trying to get away.”

“As you say, Ben Rogers. How can they let go if there's a guard watching them? Ready to fire if they move an inch?

“A guard, that's a good one. So someone has to stay the night watching and without to sleep. I think this is stupid. 'Cause no one can rescue them once they arrive?”

“Because it's not in the books. Now Well Rogers, you wanna get things done right or not? That's the idea, don't you think the people who made the book didn't do you know what is the right thing to do? Do you think you know more than them? no sir, the we will just kidnap them the right way.”

“I don't mind, but I still think it's a stupid way anyway. way, tell me, do we kill women too?

“Look, Well Rogers, if I were as ignorant as you are, I wouldn't let Matar women? Of course! That's not in the books. You trap them in the cave and be polite as a pie and little by little they will fall in love with you and never but they will want to leave.”

“Well, if that's the way I agree, but be careful that maybe the cave can be crowded with women and men waiting to be rescued that will have no place to the robberies, but go ahead, I have nothing to talk about.”

Don't go out again until the dwarves are gone.

Suddenly he found that the music and singing had stopped, and they were looking at him with eyes gleaming in the darkness.

“Where are you going?” said Thorin, in a tone that seemed to show that he he had guessed the two halves of the hobbit's mind.

“What do you think about a little light?” said Bilbo apologetically.

"We like the dark" said all the dwarves. “Let the business of darkness for the night! There are still many hours until nightfall.”

"Clear!" said Bilbo, and hastily sat down. He missed the bank and hit the para-shock, hitting a shovel with everything, which made a noise.

"Hey!" said Gandalf "Let Thorin speak!" and that was how Thorin began.

“Gandalf, dwarves and Mr. Baggins! We are meeting at our friend's house and fellow conspirator, that excellent and audacious hobbit, that the hairs of his toes never fall off!! Cheers to your beer and wine.” He paused briefly to take a breath and waited for a polite reply from the hobbit, but the hobbit could not find praise for him, because he was wagging his mouth in protest at being called audacious and worst of all, a fellow conspirator, just not being able to speak nothing, he was so lost that Thorin continued:

“We met to discuss our plans, our methods, policy and gadgets. We must begin soon before the fall of the day arrives and our long trip, trip to which some

The mountain is smoked under the moon;

The dwarves, they hear the march of the end.

They flee the palace to the fall of death

Under your feet, under the moon.

Far away from the sinister mysterious mountain

Deep dungeons and dark caves

We must always, before daybreak,

Earn our harps and gold for him!

As they sang, the hobbit fell more and more in love with the beautiful things handmade and by magic passing through him, an intense and envious love, with the desire of the hearts of dwarves. Until something awakened him inside him, a desire to go out and see the big hills and listen to the pines and the waterfall, explore the caves and use a sword instead of a cane. He looked out the window, the stars were shining in the dark sky above the trees, it reminded him of the dwarven jewels in those dark caves. Suddenly, in the forest, beyond the waters, a flame sprang up, probably someone lighting a fire, he thought of a dragon quietly on his hill and feeding the fire. He felt a chill and suddenly he was just Mr Baggins, down the hill again.

He got up shaking. He had less than half the will to seek the lamp and half to pretend, and run and hide behind the beer kegs in the basement, Thorin. They came back with violas so big that they were bigger than they were and with the Thorin's harp trapped in a green garment. It was a beautiful golden harp. And when Thorin touched it, the music began, so sudden and sweet that Bilbo forgot all about it. rest, and was taken to dark lands over strange moons, far beyond the waters, and far away from your Hobbit house on the hill.

Darkness filled the room through the small window overlooking the hill; The bonfire crackled, it was already April, and they kept playing while the shadow of the beard de Galdalf fanned against the wall.

Darkness filled the entire room and the fire went out, all shadows disappeared, and even so they continued to play, suddenly the first one started to singing, followed by the next and the next, a very loud dwarf chanting set in in the old houses; and this is a fraction of your music, if it can be the sound without the song.

Beyond the icy mysterious mountain Deep in the dungeons and ancient caves
We must leave before the end of the day
Search for pale enchanted gold.

The dwarves of yore created mighty spells
While hammers rang like bells
In a deep place where darkness sleeps
In hollow walls beneath the hills.

And of course they didn't do any of those horrendous things, everything was cleaned up and put away as fast as lightning, while the hobbit was lost in the middle of the kitchen trying to figure out what they were doing. so they came back and they found Thorin with his feet on the bumper smoking a pipe. They I was making huge smoke rings, where they wanted to send the rings they went, behind the clock or under the table, or around the ceiling, but wherever it went, no they were fast enough to escape Gandalf. Pop! He sent a small ring of smoke from his short clay pipe, directly into Thorin's other rings.
Then Gandalf's smoke rings turned green and returned to the top of the mage head. He had a cloud of smoke over him, and by daylight he
It looked strange and mysterious. Bilbo stood and watched, he loved diamond rings.
smoke, he was embarrassed to remember how proud he was of the ring of smoke he'd sent over the hill the previous morning.

“Now some music!” said Thorin. “Bring the instruments”

Kili and Fili rushed in with their bags and brought out the little violins; Dori, Nori and Ori brought flutes from somewhere inside their coats; bombur made a drum from the wall; Bifur and Bofur went out and brought clarinets that had left next to the canes. Dwalin and Balin said, “Excuse me, I left my on the porch” “Bring mine with you please!” said

“Laid some eggs, what a good companion!” Galdalf called to him, while the hobbit was checking the pantry. “And bring the frozen chicken and pickles too!”

“You seem to know more about what's in my pantry than I do.
same!" thought Mr. Baggins, who was feeling disconcerted, and wondered, because a slightly less famous adventurer hadn't come to his house. until he manage to gather all the snacks, bottles, forks and knives, glasses and plates and spoons without piling up in large quantities, he was getting very angry, that his face reddened and began to burn.

“Confess and harass these dwarves!” he said aloud. “Because they don't come to help us?” See and observe! There is Bali and Dwalin at the kitchen door, and Fili and Kili behind them, and before he could even say 'knife' they had slammed trays and a couple of small tables in the hall and started all over again.

Gandalf sat at the end with the thirteen dwarves around him: and Bilbo sat in a stool by the fire, biting into a cookie (he had lost most of part of the appetite), trying to look at it and think that it was all perfectly normal and that didn't seem like an adventure at all. The dwarves ate and ate, talked and talked and time passed. At least they fixed the chairs, and Bilbo went to clear the table and get the plates and glasses.

“I believe you are all staying for dinner?” he said in the most polite that you got.

“Beware, beware!!” he said. “It is not your business, Bilbo, to keep friends waiting, and open the door like that! Let me introduce Bifur, Bofur, Bombur and especially Thorun!”

“At your services!” said Bifur, Bofur and Bombur. So they hung two yellow hoods and a pale green; and a sky blue along with a silver tassel. This last one belonging to Thoruin, a huge and important dwarf, in fact, none another is more important than Thorin Oakenshield, who in turn was not happy to waiting for Bilbo along with Bifur, Bofur and Bombur on top of him, since the Bombur is extremely fat and heavy. Thorin really was very arrogant and didn't said nothing about the 'service'; but poor Mr. Baggins apologized so many times that for end relented “pray not to mention it”

“Now everyone is here!” said Gandalf, looking at the thirteen hoods hanging, the best disposable hoodie party, and your own hanging hat on the pin. “But what a joyful meeting! I hope there's something left for the latecomers to eat and drink! What was this? Tea! No thank you! I think I'm going to want some Red wine."

“And to me,” said Thorin.

"And raspberry jam and apple pie," said Bifur

"And meat and cheese pie," said Bofur

"And pork pie and salad," said Bombur

"And more cakes, and coffee and beer, if you don't mind," the other dwarves they said through the door.

stay for dinner. Then the bell rang again louder than ever, and he had to run to the door. There weren't four after all, there were five. Another dwarf had appeared while they were waiting in the hall. He had barely turned the knob, everyone was already inside, greeting each other and saying “at your service” one after the other. Dori, Nori, Ori, Oin and Gloin were their names; and then soon after two purple hoods, one gray, one brown and one white were hanging from the nail, and they entered holding their belts of silver and gold to join each other. That had already become a crowd.
Some were asking for beer, some for some coffee, and all for cake; so the hobbit
It was very busy for quite some time.

A big pot of coffee had just come from the fire, the cakes were gone, and the dwarves were starting a round of buttery roasts, until three came, a very loud beat. Not a touch, but a knock on the pretty green door of the man's house.
hobbit. Someone was hitting with a bat!

Bildo ran along the course very angry and a mixture of perplexed with baffled, this was the weirdest Wednesday he can remember in the whole your life. He threw open the door with everything in one shove and they all fell on top of him.
other. More dwarfs, more four! And Gandalf was behind him leaning on his staff and laughing.
Opening that beautiful door with everything, he left it very dented; and even had dropped the secret mark he had placed the morning before.

hung his red near it, and "Balin at your service," he said with his hand on your chest.

"Thanks!" said Bilbo with a sigh. That wasn't the right thing to say, but they started to arrive and frustrated him greatly. He loves visitors but he likes to know who they are before they arrive, and he prefers that he invite them himself. He thought of the terrible possibility that the cakes would run out and then he, with the host: he knew it was his duty and he took care of it, even if it was painful, he might have what to go without

“Come in and have some tea!” he managed to say after taking a deep breath.

"A little beer would serve me better, if it's the same for you, my dear" said Balin with the white beard. “But I don't care about cake, seed cake, if you have any”

"Many!" Bilbo found himself answering, to his own surprise; he ran away to the basement to fill a mug of beer, and then went to the pantry to get two cakes of seeds he had roasted that afternoon for his dinner.

When he came back, Balin and Dwalin were talking at a table like old friends (but actually they are brothers). Bilbo put the beer and the cake in the in front of them, when a very loud ringing rang the bell again, and then another ringing

"Gandalf for sure this time." He thought as he headed for the door. But it wasn't him. It was two more dwarves, with blue hoods and silver belts, and yellow

"I'm sorry to keep you waiting" he was going to say when he saw that it wasn't Gandalf who had arrived. He was a dwarf with a blue beard and a golden belt, and very bright eyes. under the dark green hood. As soon as the door opened, he walked in, as if he was waiting for him.

He hung his cloak on the nearest nail, and "Dwalin at your service!" he said with a slight bow.

“Bilbo Baggins to yours!” said the hobbit, too surprised to ask anything at that moment. When the silence that followed that moment started to bother, he added: “And I was about to get some tea; please come with me and get some.”

A little harsh perhaps, but he meant well. And what would you do if a dwarf penetrates to enter your house and hang your things on the wall without any explanation?

They hadn't been at the table very long, in fact they had just finished. starting to eat the third cake, when another louder still came.

"Excuse me!" said the hobbit, and towards the door he went;

"So you've finally arrived!" That's what he was going to tell Gandalf this morning. moment, but it wasn't him. In fact, it was a dwarf who appeared to be very old, with a white beard and scarlet hood; and he also entered as soon as the door opened, as if he had been invited.

"I see, they've already started to arrive," he said when he saw the green hood of the Dwalin hanging. He

Very interesting for me, very good for you, and very profitable too, very probably, if you ever manage to catch this.”

"Sorry! I don't want any adventures, thank you. I do not think so. Good Morning! But please come for tea whenever you want! Why not tomorrow? Come tomorrow! Goodbye!" With that the hobbit closed his green door and went into the house and spoke as fast as you can, not daring to be rude. Wizards are wizards after all.

“Why the hell did I offer him tea!” he thought to himself while he went to the pantry. He had just had breakfast, but thought that one or two two cakes and a drink wouldn't do any harm after what happened, it would even do good.
Meanwhile Gandalf was outside the door laughing hard but surreptitiously. After a while he entered, and with the end of his staff he made a mark on the hobbit's beautiful green door. So he left at the same time as Bilbo was finishing his second cake and was beginning to think he had escaped. of adventure very well.

The other day he had almost forgotten what had happened the day before. with Gandalf. He didn't remember things very well unless he had put at their engagement table 'Gandalf Tea Wednesday. Yesterday he was very shaken to do anything like that.

Just before tea time, a very loud ringing rang from the bell at the door of the forward, and then he remembered! He ran out and put the kettle on and another cup and a saucers, an extra cake or two, and ran for the door.

tough diamonds that stick together and never appear unfinished until they are requested? Not the fellow who used to tell amazing tales at parties, about dragons, goblins and giants, about rescuing princesses and the unexpected luck of children of widows? Not the man who used to make so many great fireworks House made! I remember those! Old Took got used to having them on the eve of Summer Solstice. Splendid! They used to rise like great lilies, dragonskull flower and fire laburnums that hang in the twilight at night all!" You will notice that Mr. Baggins was not as prosaic as he thinks he is, and he was also very fond of flowers. "My God!" he continued. “Not the Gandalf who was responsible for so many quiet lands coming out of nowhere for adventures? since rising in trees to visit elves, or sail ships to other shores! bless me life used to be pretty easygoing, I mean, there was a time when you were very upsetting things around here. I'm sorry but I had no idea that you were still Business."

“Where else would I be?” said the wizard. “Anyway, I'm glad to you remember something about me. You seem to fondly remember the fireworks artifice, and that without losing hope. In fact, for your old grandfather Took's sake and Poor Belladonna's sake, I'll give you what you asked for."

"I'm sorry, I didn't ask for anything!"

“Yes, you asked! Twice now. I'm sorry I'll give you. actually i I'll go so far as to send you on this adventure.

on their own, as they are all little hobbit boys and girls.

All that innocent Bilbo saw that morning was an old man with a staff. He had a big, pointed blue hat, a long gray cape, a silver scarf over his big white beard that reaches below his waist and a huge black boot.

"Good Morning!" said Bilbo, and he really spoke from the heart. the sun was shining and the grass very green. But Gandalf looked at him over his thick eyebrows that stuck out of his somber hat.

"What do you mean?" said Bilbo. “Such a fine morning for a pipe of tobacco outside the home. If you have a pipe, sit here with me and smoke with me! Take your time, we have the whole day ahead of us.” Then Bilbo sat down in a seat by the door and crossed her legs, and there was a beautiful gray smoke ring left, which without breaking went up the hill.

"Very handsome!" Said Gandalf. "But I don't have time to do that this morning. I'm looking for someone to share an adventure I'm on programming, and it is very difficult to find someone.”

“I think so, in this region! It's a very quiet area.

Chapter I

AN UNEXPECTED PARTY

In a hole in the ground lived a hobbit. Not in a nasty, dirty, wet hole, full of humus and worms and a bad smell, not a dry, bare, sandy hole without nothing to sit down to rest or eat: it was a hobbit hole, and that means comfort.

It has a perfect round door at the entrance, painted green with a handle. yellow in the center. The door opens into a tube-shaped hall, like a tunnel: a very comfortable tunnel without smoke, with covered walls and sloping floor and with carpet, with polished chairs and lots and lots of nails for hats and coats, the hobbit loved to have visitors. The tunnel was quite long and didn't follow a straight line.
straight into the hill, The Hill, as people in the know call it, and many small round doors

open inside, first on one side then the other. There was no upstairs, the bedroom, bathroom, basements, pantries (lots of these), wardrobes (he has a bedroom just for clothes), kitchen, dining room, all on the same floor and of course, all in the same ticket. The best rooms were on the left of the corridor (when entering), because those were the only ones with windows, round windows that overlook the garden and for the big browns and the river.

This hobbit was a very prosperous hobbit, and his name was Baggins. You Bagginses have lived on this hill for as long as anyone can remember, and the people consider very respectful, not because most of them are rich, but also because they never did any adventures and nothing unexpected: you can say a Baggins won't ask any questions if you don't talk to him. That is the story of how a Baggins had an adventure, and found himself doing and talking unexpected things. He may have lost the respect of his neighbors, but he gained it, well, you'll see if he won anything in the end.

The mother of a particular hobbit, what is a hobbit? I believe hobbits need a description, since they became rare and shy of people big, as they call us. They are (or were) small people, about half of our height, and smaller than the bearded dwarves. Hobbits don't have beards. They have little or no magic in them, except the normal everyday what helps them to disappear quickly and silently when people big like you and me come to pester them, making noise like elephants they can hear a mile away. They tend to be fat in the region of the stomach; they dress in vibrant colors (green and yellow); don't wear sneakers, because your feet grow a lot and you also have hair on your feet, brown like the head(which is curly); has long brown fingers, pretty faces and laughs a lot fruit-scented (especially after dinner, which they have twice a day when they can). Now you know enough to go on. As I was saying, the mother of this hobbit, from Bilbo Baggins, is the famous Belladonna Took, one of the three incredible daughters of old Took, leader of the hobbits who live beyond the water, little river down the hill. It is very common to hear (in other families) that a long time ago a Took ancestor had a fairy wife. This was clearly nonsense, but there certainly was something not common in hobbits among them, and sometimes members of the Took clan go on an adventure. They secretly disappeared; but the fact that the Took are not as respected as the Bagginses, although they are undoubtedly much richer.

Not that Belladonna Took has had any kind of fling, after she became Mrs. Bungo Baggins. Bungo, who is Bilbo's father, built the hobbit house more luxurious for her (and part of it with her money) that was to be found people and had no use for adventures. Disgusting things, not comfortable and disturbing! Makes you late for dinner! I can't see what anyone sees in them," said our Mr. Baggins, putting a thumb behind his armband, and let go another even bigger smoke ring. So he picked up his morning letters and began to read, pretending to pay no more attention to the old man. He had made up his mind, that he would not he was his type, and he wanted him to go away. But the old man did not move. He stayed leaning on his staff and looking at the hobbit without saying anything, until Bilbo felt very uncomfortable.

"Good Morning!" he finally said. "We don't want any adventures for here, thank you! You can try over the hill or across the Water." With that he I meant the conversation was over.

"How many things do you use to say 'Good morning'!" said Gandalf. "Now you it means you want to get rid of me, and that it won't be good if I don't;"

"Of course not, of course not, my good lord! Let me see, I don't think know your name?"

Yes, yes, my good lord, and I know your name, Mr. Bildo Baggins. And you know yes my name, although you don't remember that i belonged here. I am Gandalf, and Gandalf is me! And to think that I lived to be greeted with a good day from the son of Belladonna Took, like I'm selling buttons door to door!"

"Gandalf, Gandalf! My God! wouldn't it be the pilgrim magician that gave to the Old Took a pair of magic beard; and each of them carried a tool bag and a sword. they jumped inside just as the door started to open- Bildo was not surprised.

“What can I do for you, my dwarves?” he said.

“Kili at your service!” spoke one. “And Phil!” added the other; both took their blue hoods and bowed.

“For you, and your families!” replied Bilbo, recalling the good ways this time.

"I see, Dwalin and Balin are already here," said Kili. “Let's get together crowd!"

"Crowd!" thought Mr. Baggins. "I do not like this. I really must stay here and think for a while, maybe even have a drink.” He had just taken a sip, when in the corner, while four dwarfs were sitting at the table, and talking about mines, gold and goblin trouble, and the ravages of dragons, and many other things, which he couldn't understand, and didn't care to understand either, because they seem to be very 'adventurous', when suddenly, the bell rang again, as if some mischievous hobbit child wanted to pull the handle off.

"Anybody home!!" he said

“From the noise it's at least four,” Fili said.

“Also we saw that they were following us.”

The poor hobbit sat down in the hall and rested his head in his hands, and asked what had happened, and what would happen, and if everyone would

"Clear!" said Thorin. “After all, we shouldn't carry on with business until too long. later, we should have some music first. Now to begin!”

So the twelve dwarves, minus Thorin, he was very important and stayed for talk to Gandalf, got up quickly and made piles and piles of many stuff. And so they went, not waiting for the flags and banking on piles of plates, each with a bottle in his hand raised aloft, while the hobbit ran and said “please be careful!” and “Please don't bother I can handle myself!”
But the dwarves just began to sing:

Cracked glasses and broken plates!
Blunt knives, golden spoons!
That's what in Bilbo causes groans Broken bottles and burnt corks!

Step on grease, cut the towel!
On the rug throw the bones!
Milk spilled on the floor curdles!
There are wine stains on every door!

Throw this crockery into boiling water;
Only you ate a lot of stick;
If nothing breaks, no matter how hard you try,
Roll, roll across the floor!

That's what Bilbo Baggins hates!
Watch out! Watch out for the party dishes!

To the ancient king and his elf lord

They created treasures of named greatness

The Stones shaped, the light captured

Trapping it in the gems of the sword's hilt

In silver necklaces they joined

Flowering stars made crowns

Of dragon fire and on the same cord

Merged the light of the Sun and Moon

Beyond the cold misty mountains

Entering caverns lost dungeons

We must leave before the sun comes up

Searching for treasures long forgotten

For your use cups were carved

And harps of gold, where no one lives

They lay lost and their songs

By men and elves were not heard

Pine trees hummed over the mountain

Howled the winds on blue nights

The red fire burned evenly

The torch trees in beams of light

The bells rang raining in the valley

Pale anxious faces rose

Wrathful the fierce dragon had risen

Tearing down beautiful houses and towers they prayed for it 'cause Decon Winn don't get the money he lost in the pig? Why can't the widow get the silver box that was stolen?

Watson couldn't put on weight? No, I said to myself, this is all a lie. I went to have with the widow and I told her about it and she explained that by praying you could only get 'gifts spiritual'. This came as a shock to me, but she told me what it meant: I should help other people and do all he could for them and look out for them at all times. the moment and never think of me. This included Miss Watson, as I understand it. I went take a walk through the woods and I thought about what she said to me for a long time, only I didn't find any advantage in that conversation, except for the other people, who were to win. So I decided that I wasn't going to worry about prayers anymore. Sometimes, the widow would call me and talk to me about God in a way that led me to make your mouth water. But the next day Miss Watson was talking to me and threw everything to the ground. It seemed to me that there were two gods: with the widow's God imagined a fine spectacle, but there was no escape possible when the girl Watson caught me. I thought about everything and concluded that I would go with the widow's God if he accepted, although I did not understand what he gained from it, since I was very ignorant and a bit of a cheater. Nobody had seen my father for over a year and I I was very comfortable with that. I never wanted to see him again. used to give me beatings when he was sober and laid his hands on me, even though I hid in the forest most of the time he appeared. Well by that time they found him drowned in the river, about 18 kilometers from the village, people said. Fur least, they thought it was him, they said the drowned man was the same size, he was with ragged clothes and very long hair, and my father was really so. But they couldn't distinguish “Let's start this band of muggers and call it the Tom Sawyer Gang.

Whoever wants to enter must swear an oath and write his name in blood.”
As everyone wanted to join the gang, Tom took a sheet of paper where he had written the oath and read it; all the boys had to stay loyal to the gang and never tell any of the secrets, and if someone did something to one of the boys in gang, the boy who received the order to kill that person and his family had fulfill the mission and couldn't do anything, neither eat nor sleep until I killed them.
a cross on their chests, as that was the gang's sign. Nobody out of the pack could use that mark, and if he did, he had to be sued, and if he did it again this one would have to be killed. And if someone who belonged to the pack told the secrets, we had to slit his throat and after burning his corpse and scattering his ashes everywhere, and we stuck to it the name of the list written in blood and never again would be mentioned by the gang. It took with a curse on top and was forgotten for ever. Everyone said it was a nice oath and asked Tom if he had out of his head by his own imagination. He said that part was his idea, but that the
the rest was taken from pirates' and thieves' books and that gangs with a minimum of elegance had a similar oath. Some thought it would be better to kill the families of the boys who told the secrets. Tom said it was a nice idea, Go on, take a pencil and write it down. And then Ben Rogers said:

“But here Huck Finn has no family. What is that you're going to do with him” “And then? He has a father, doesn't he? said Tom Sawyer. "Yea, has a father, but nowadays nobody finds him. I used to lie with the pigs of the factory, but no one has seen him for a year or more.” They discussed the matter and wanted me kicked out of the gang, because all the boys had to have a family or someone most; then he tiptoed down the steps and stood between us. So close that we could touch it. Well, it's been a few minutes without hearing anyone, and we all good together. Out of nowhere, my ankle started to itch, but I didn't courage to scratch it, so my ear started to itch in the ear and then in the back, even the shoulders. I felt like I was going to die if I didn't scratch. well i noticed many times that when we are with refined people or at a funeral, or trying to sleep when we're not sleepy, or somewhere we can't scratch, we feel like scratching ourselves in more than a thousand different places. Shortly after, the Jim said:

“Tell me, who are you? Where? Dammit me, I heard someone. Oh, I know very well what I'm going to do, I'm going to stay here and wait for it to make noise again."

He sat on the floor between me and Tom. He leaned against a tree and stretched out his arms. legs until one of them almost touched mine. I started having itchy nose. the itch
It was so much that it brought tears to her eyes. But I didn't have the courage to scratch myself.
Then the itch started on the side, and then on the bottom. I couldn't be still without move. This suffering lasted about six or seven minutes, but it felt much longer. time than that. I got itchy in eleven different places. I thought I wasn't going put up with it any longer, not even for a minute. but I ground my teeth and prepared myself to withstand the itching. At that moment, Jim began to breathe heavily and then snoring, and I quickly got comfortable again.

Tom gave me a signal—a kind of noise with his mouth—and we left. crawling. When we were ten feet away, Tom whispered to me overheard, said he wanted to tie Jim to the tree, just for fun. But I said that no, he could wake up and it would be a mess and they would find out I wasn't in House. Tom said he didn't have enough candles, that he was going his face, because he had spent so much time in the water that he no longer looked like a face. They said it was floating on its back. They took him and buried him in the margin. But I wasn't feeling comfortable, because I thought of something. I know very well that a drowned man does not stand on his back, but on his front. so that I knew it was not my father, but a woman in his clothes. And again I felt uncomfortable. I thought my old man would show up at one time or another, even I don't want it.

We played thieves for about a month, but soon after I retired from that. Everyone actually resigned. We hadn't robbed anyone, let alone people murdered, we just pretended that. We used to run through the forest and throw over women who were carrying vegetables in the cart to the market, but we never robbed anyone. Tom Sawyer called pigs 'ingots', and turnips and these 'jewelry' things, and then we'd go to the cave and have a party around the talk about what we had stolen and how many 'people' we had murdered and marked with a cross. But I saw no advantage in that. One time, Tom sent a boy to run through the village with a burning stick, which he named banner (which was the signal for the gang to assemble), and then told us that he had news secrets, which he received from his spies, the news was that the next day, many Spanish merchants and wealthy Arabs would camp in the Hollow Cave with 200 elephants, 600 camels and over 1000 pack mules, all of them full of diamonds. They do not they only had one guard, but yes, 400 soldiers, so we were going to make a ambush, as he said, and kill everything and keep things. he said we had to prepare our swords and weapons and get ready. He was able to chase wagon with turnips, but I had to keep my swords and firearms clean, though were just sticks and broom handles; we could clean them until we die, because would not get any better than before. I do not there were piles of old greasy cards lying on the floor, old bottles of whiskey and some masks made of black cloth; and all over the wall there were the most ignorant kinds of words and images made with charcoal. Had two cloth dresses cheap, dirty and old, and a sun cap, and some women's underwear, hanging on the wall, and some men's clothing. We put everything in the canoe; maybe that's right. There was an old boy's straw hat on the floor; I caught this too. And there was a bottle that had milk in it, and it had a cloth stopper for the baby take, as if it were a bottle. We were going to get the bottle but it was broken. There was an old, half-destroyed chest, and another hair chest with the broken hinges. They were open, but there was nothing of value inside them.

From the way things were spread out, we deduced that people left with in a great hurry, and they did not take what was not arranged to take most of your things.

We have an old tin lantern, a butcher's knife without a handle, a
A brand new Barlow knife that is worth two coins in any store, and lots of tallow candles, a pewter candlestick, a bottle of gourd and a pewter cup, and a quilt old and battered, and a bag with needles and pins along with beeswax and buttons and line and everything inside this chest, along with some nails and an axe, and a line of fishing as thick as my little finger with some huge hooks in it, and a roll of suede, and a leather collar, and a horseshoe, and a few bottles of medicine that didn't they had a label; and just as we were leaving I found a nice curry comb preserved, and Jim found a battered old violin bow and a wooden leg. At straps were broken, but other than that, it was a good enough leg, although it was too long for me and not long enough for Jim.

And so, we took everything around, we made a good transport. when we were ready to leave, we were 400 meters below the island, and it was a very clear day; so i made jim lie down until finally it was on the shores. The water was three or four feet deep. depth at the bottom of the island and Illinois. That side had many kilometers wide; but on the Missouri side it was the same distance as ever – half a mile--because the Missouri coast was made up of huge cliffs.

During the day, we paddled across the island in the canoe. It was very cool and dark in the deep in the forest, even though the sun was very hot outside. Us we walked among the trees, and sometimes the vines were so thick that we had to take another route to follow the path. Well, every time you saw trees old and broken, you could see rabbits and snakes too; and after the island overflowed the animals became very sweet, all this due to the great hunger that passed, so much so that you could pet them, but not the snakes and turtles-these glided over the water. At the top of our cave, it was full of these animals.

We could have had pets if we wanted to.
One night we took a small part of a wooden raft – planks of very good pine. It was 3.5 meters wide and about 4.5 meters long, and the top was 15 or 17 centimeters above the water, a very good level and level. We could see the logs going downriver with the sunrise, but we couldn't we took them; let us not go out while it was daylight.
Another night, when we were in the corner of the island, just before dawn, we saw a wooden house on the west side. It was a two-story house and was quite sideways. We went outside and climbed aboard – bumped into a window in the upstairs. But it was so dark you couldn't see anything, so we sped up the canoe and we wait in it until daylight.

The light started to come in before we reached the bottom of the island. so we look through the window. We could see a bed, a table, two old chairs and many things

He tore it all up and said:

“I'll give you something better, I'll give you a cow hide.

He stood there mumbling and growling for about a minute, and then he said:

“You're not so much affection, are you? A bed; and bedding; and carpet on floor, all that and your own father sleeping with the pigs? I saw a son like that. You bet I'll get some said before I'm done with you, you don't have stop, right? Everyone says you're rich, huh? - What's that?"

"They lie, it's that simple."

“Look here, pay attention to how you talk to me; I'm here with all I can have, so don't lecture me. I've been in town for two days now and all I I hear you are rich. There on the river I also heard just that. That's why I I came. You will give me that money by tomorrow, period.”

"I don't have any money".

"It's a lie. Judge Thatcher has it. Do you too? I want it, period."

“I don't have money, I'm telling you. You can ask Judge Thatcher; she will tell you the same.”

"Fine. I'll ask him; and I'll make him pay too, or I'll know why.

Tell me how much do you have now, in your pockets? I want to."

"I don't have just a dollar, and I need to -"

"It doesn't matter what you need, just give it to me."

He took it and bit it to see if it was real, then said he was going into town to get it. a little whiskey; said he hadn't had a drink all day. When he left the shed, he he came back just to curse me, and telling me to try to be better than him; and when i thought he was gone he came back and asked me to be smart

He started to be with the widow a lot and she finally got annoyed, said that if he didn't stop doing that, she was going to get him into trouble. Well, wasn't he crazy? He said he was going to show who Huck Finn's boss really was. So he me watched for a whole day in the spring and finally picked me up, and took me to the river about three miles, and crossed to the Illinois coast in a skiff where he had lots of trees and there were no houses, just a log cabin in a place where the woods were so dense you could get lost if you didn't know where you were.

He kept me close to him the whole time, that I didn't have any opportunity to escape. We were living in that old cabin, and always with the doors locked and the key under his head while he slept. I think he had a weapon he had stolen, and so we survived, from fishing and hunting. Sometimes he would lock me up and go to the store, about three miles to the ferry, and exchange fish and hunting for whiskey, coming home and getting drunk, and having fun, licking me. the widow found out where I was, and she a man to try to rescue me; but daddy kicked out with the gun, and it didn't take long for me to get used to where I was, and I ended up I liked it, everything except the leather part.

It was kind of tedious and cheerful, being quiet all day, smoking and fishing, and running out of books and with nothing to study. Two months or more went by, and my clothes ran out getting run down and dirty, and i couldn't understand how i could have all this in the house of the widow, I had my thieves washed and food on my plate, I could comb my hair, go to bed and get up whenever I like, and keep busy with a book, and have old Miss Watson bothering me all the time. I didn't want to go back. I had stopped swearing, because the widow didn't like it; but now I'm back to doing it because daddy don't complain about it. It was really good times out there in the forest, with light everything around.

But Dad got more and more skillful with the hickey, and I by a chimney chimney. Look, I say, such a hat for me to wear, one of the men richest people in this city, if only I could assert my rights.

“Oh yes, this is a wonderful, wonderful government. Why, see. There was a free black from Ohio; a mulatto, almost as white as a white man. he had the whitest shirt ever seen, and also, and the brightest hat ever seen; and there isn't a man with clothes as fancy as his in that city; he possessed a gold watch and chain, and a silver-tipped cane—the nabob (rich man, with fortune coming from the East) oldest and gray-haired in the state. It's the what do you think? They say he was a professor at a college, he spoke all kinds of languages and knew everything. And this is not the West. They said he could vote when were at home. Well that drove me crazy. I think, which way the country is taking? It was election day, and I was about to go vote, if I hadn't been so drunk; but when I was told there was a state in this country where black people were allowed vote, I gave up. I said I will never vote again. That's exactly what I said; and everyone heard me; and the country may end in my opinion, – I will never vote again while you're alive. And seeing the way that nigga was, why, he wouldn't give me passage if I hadn't pushed him. I keep saying, 'cause this nigga ain't put up for auction and sold? That's what I want to know. I was told he couldn't be sold because it hadn't been in the state for more than six months. Okay, he's a specimen. That's what he calls government, that you can't sell a free nigga until that he has been in the state for six months. Here is a government that calls itself a government, and pretends to be a government, and thinks it is a government,

He unlocked the door and I fled along the riverbank. I noticed some pieces of twigs and some floating things, and some bark; so I understood that the river had started to rise. I found I would have a great time if I was in town. The June rise used to be a lucky thing for me; because as soon as the Ascent began, many logs appeared floating, and pieces of logs – sometimes a dozen logs together; so all you had to do was collect them and sell them for loggers and sawmills.

I climbed the bank with one eye on Dad and the other on what might happen on the way up. In suddenly a canoe appears; simply a beauty, too, about four meters long, coming as high as a duck. I threw myself headlong into the water like a frog, clothes and all, and headed towards the canoe. I just hoped there was someone inside lying down, because people often did it to trick people, and when someone came close, they would stand up and laugh at him. But there wasn't this time. It was a drifting canoe, I climbed into it and paddled to the beach. I think the old man will be happy when you see this, it must be worth ten dollars. But when I got to the shore, daddy still didn't was there, and I ran into a little stream that looked like a ravine, all of filled with vines and willows, I had another idea; i figured i would drive it well, and then I ran through the woods, and down the river for about fifty miles and camped in a good place, I had no problem walking.

It was quite close to the shack, and I thought I heard the old man coming all the time; but I to I took it hidden; so I went out and looked around the willows, and there was the old man in the way just by drawing a bead on a bird with your gun. So he didn't see anything.

When he got along, it was hard for me to get used to the “hazing” a log on the bank in a small open place. Where the trunk split I could spy.

Little by little she appeared, getting so close that they could run out and walk to the beach. Almost everyone was on the boat. Daddy, Judge Thatcher, Bessie Thatcher, Jo Harper, Tom Sawyer, his old aunt Polly, Sid, Mary, and many more.
Everyone was talking about the murder, but the captain interrupted and said:

“Look carefully now; the current is getting closer to here, and maybe it has I arrive at the beach and curl up in some weeds at the edge of the water. So I hope, from anyway."

I didn't expect this. Everyone had huddled together and bent over, almost in my man, and they were very attentive. I could see them easily, but they couldn't see.
Then the captain shouted:

"Back off!" and the cannon blasted so hard right in front of me that it left me deaf from the noise and nearly blind from the smoke, and I thought it was gone. If they had bullets, I think they would have been able to kill whoever they were looking for. Well, I realized I wasn't hurt, thank God. The boat floated and disappeared from view around the island. I could hear the noise, every now and then, more and more far away, and little by little, I no longer heard. The island was about five miles across. length. I thought they had reached the edge of the beach, and I was giving up.
But they still had. They circled the foot of the island and started up the Missouri side, under steam, and rumbling from time to time as they went along.
I crossed over to that side and watched them. When they arrived at the island side they they stopped shooting and threw themselves on the Missouri coast and went home to town.

I knew it was okay now. No one else would come after me. I took my canoe traps and made a

I rested well and smoked my pipe, looking up at the sky; without any clouds. The sky it feels so deep when you lie on your back under the moonlight; I never had noticed this before. And how far can you hear on the water these nights! I heard people talking on landing. I also heard what they said, every word. One
The man said that the period was coming when the days were long and the nights were short. Though another said this wasn't one of the shorts, he watched, and then everyone they laughed, and he said it again, and they laughed again; then they woke up someone else and they told him, and laughed again, but he did not laugh; he ripped something quickly and said to leave him alone. The first guy said he bent down to tell your old woman, and she would think it all very well; but he said it wasn't it had nothing to do with what he had just said. I heard a man say that it was nearly three o'clock and he hoped daylight would last no more than a week. After that, the conversation became more and more distant, and I could no longer distinguish the words; but I could hear the murmur, and every now and then a laugh too, but it seemed too far away.

I was very far, under the raft. I got up and there was Jackson Island, about four kilometers downstream, there were a lot of heavy woods in the middle of the river. river, large and dark, as well as solid, like a steamboat without light. No there is no sign on the headboard, everything was underwater.

It didn't take me long to get there. I passed through my head with frightening speed, the The current was so fast, and then I entered the water and stopped on the side towards the coast of Illinois. I went with the canoe to the depths of the bank I knew; I had to break the willow branches to enter; and when I accelerated no one saw the canoe by the outside.

after they fled the prairie farms. I shot this guy and took him to the camping.

I took the ax and knocked on the door. I hit and cut him considerably. I took the pig, and I took him back to the table and cut his throat with the axe, and laid him on the ground to bleed; I say floor because it was floor, compacted and without boards. Well in then I took an old sack and filled it with big rocks, all I could put on, and started messing with the pig, dragged the bag to the door and went into the forest down the river and I threw it there, and it sank, out of sight. I could clearly see that something had been dragged across the floor. I wish Tom Sawyer was there; I knew he would be interested in that kind of business and put some fancy touches on it. Nobody could do a thing like Tom Sawyer.

Well, lastly I pulled some of my hair out, and smeared a lot of blood on my hair. axe, and stuck it in the back, hanging the ax in the corner. So I took the pig and held it to my chest with my jacket (so it wouldn't drip) until get a good chunk down and then throw it in the river. So I thought of another thing. So I went and got the food bag and my old canoe saw, and brought them home. I took the bag to where it normally was and made a hole in the bottom with the saw, because there are no forks or knives there, Dad did everything in the kitchen with his switchblade. So I carried the bag about three hundred feet through the grass and fur. willows east of the house to a shallow lake five miles wide and full of rushes and ducks too, you might say in the season. There was a swamp or a creek coming out of it on the other side that went for miles away, I don't know where it went, but not to the river. The meal was made and made a small path to the lake. I dropped the daddy's whetstone there too, to look like it had been made you kick me out, hear? That man is not here to do any good. I will go shoot him. Next time you kick me out, do you hear?”

Then he fell and fell asleep again; but what he was saying gave me a great idea, exactly what I wanted. I think to myself I can fix it this, so that no one thinks of persecuting me.

About twelve o'clock we left and went up the bank. The river was rising too much fast, and lots of driftwood was coming upstream. gradually comes part a raft of logs, nine logs together. We left with the skiff and the handles, the roasts and we brought it to land. Then we had dinner. Anyone but Dad would wait and the day dawn, to get more things; but that's not daddy's style. nine logs were enough this time; he must go straight to town and sell. So he locked me up and picked up the skiff, and began towing the boat around three-thirty. I judged that he would not return that night. I waited until I realized he was gone; so i left with saw and went to work on that log again. Before he got to the other side of the river I was already out of the hole; he and his raft were just a speck in the water there very far away.

I took the sack of corn and carried it to where the canoe was hidden, cut the vines and the twigs and placed; then I did the same with the bacon side; then the whiskey pitcher. I took all the coffee and sugar I had, and all the ammunition; I took the filling; I took the bucket and bottle of gourd; I took a ladle and a cup of tin, and my old saw along with two blankets, and the frying pan and the coffee pot.
I got fishing lines and matches and stuff – everything worth a penny. I cleaned the place. I wanted an axe, but there was none, just what was in the pile of firewood, and I knew very well why I should leave it there. I took the gun, and now everything was ready.

I had worn out the ground quite a bit crawling out of the hole and dragging so many stuff. So I fixed it the best I could it had been done by accident. Then I tied the tear in the food bag with a string, so it wouldn't leak any more, and I took it, along with my saw, to the canoe again.

It was almost dark now; so I dropped the canoe down the river under some willows that dangling from the bank and I waited for the moon to appear. I clung to a willow; then I gave a bite to eat, and little by little I lay down in the canoe to smoke a pipe and think of a plan. I tell myself they'll follow the trail of that full bag of stones to the bank and then draw the river to me. And they will follow that trail of food to the lake and sail down the stream that flows out of it to find the thieves who killed me and take things. They'll just get to hunt in the river only mine dead carcass. They'll soon get tired and won't bother with me anymore. It's all right; I can stop wherever I want. Jackson Island is good enough for me; I know this island very well, and hardly anyone ever has anyone there. And then I can row until the city nights, and sneak in and get the things I want. Jackson's Island it's the right place.

I was quite tired, and the first thing I realized was that I had slept.
When I woke up, I didn't know where I was for a minute. I got up and looked around, a little scared. Then I remembered. The river looked like miles and miles of width. The moon was so bright I could count the logs passing by, black and buildings, hundreds of meters from the coast. Everything was absolutely still, and it seemed late, and even 'smelled' late. You know what I mean, I don't know the words that can I use.

I did a good stretch and stretch, and I was about to leave when I start to hear it. a distant sound over the water. I listened. Very soon I managed to get out. It was the one monotonous and regular sound that comes from oars working in the trenches when the night it's calm. I peeked through the willow branches

“I was lying under the wood chipboard all day. I was hungry, but he was not afraid; because I knew the old lady was going to the camp, right after breakfast and out all day, and they knew that I went out with the cattle near dawn so they wouldn't miss me. You other servants wouldn't miss me either, they could go out for the holiday, as soon as the old ones were no longer in the way.

“Well, when it got dark, I took the river path, and walked about three kilometers later that he no longer had any homes. I set up my mine, that's what I had to do. If I kept trying to run away on foot, the dogs would chase me; what if I stole something to cross, they would miss that, you know, and they knew what I was going to do on the other side, and what one must do to take the path that I do. So I say, this is what I am; and I don't leave any clues.

“I see a light approaching me, so I hide with a log in my ahead and I cover half the river more, so I entered the middle of the forest, kept my head down until I could navigate again. Then I swam aft, with the head down. It was cloudy and dark. I ended up tripping and fell on the planks. O river was rising, and the current was very good; so I did my calculations, and would reach the end of the river in about forty kilometers, so I waited for dawn and I swam until I reached the woods near the Illinois side.

“But I haven't had any luck. When we went down to the head of the island one man started to come to me with a flashlight, I saw that it was no use waiting, so I threw myself into the sea and left the island. Well I had the notion that I could go to anywhere, but couldn't, the shore was too chaotic. I rounded the foot of the island and found a great place. I entered the bush

“Well, I believe you, Huck. I... I ran away.”

"Jim!"

"But mind you, you said you weren't going to tell – you know that, Huck."

“Well, I did. I said I wouldn't, and I'll stick to it. Honestly, I will. At people would call me a humble abolitionist and despise me for keeping quiet – but it makes no difference. I won't tell, and I won't go back there, either. So now, let's find out all about it.”

"Well, you see, it's us who manages - this is Miss Watson - she fills my all the time, and treats me very badly, but she said she wouldn't sell me to Orleans. But I realized they were black dealers for a while, and I started to get nervous. Well one night I crawl in to make a late night bathroom, and I hear the old lady tell Widder that she agreed to sell me to Orleans, but she I didn't want that, but she could get eight hundred dollars for me, and that was too much. money she couldn't resist. But still she tried to convince her not to that, but I didn't wait to hear the rest. I ran too fast, I came to talk to you.

“I went down the hill, intending to rob a person in the city, but people were very agitated, so I hid in the old brass shop, waited for everyone to do their shopping and waited for them to leave. Well I waited all night. they have someone hanging around all the time. A lot of people started going through with it, and about eight and nine each talking about how your daddy came to town, and saying that you I was dead. There were full of ladies and gentlemen coming to that place. At sometimes they would stop at the store and have something, so they started from the other side, so through the conversation I learned everything about the killing. I'm sorry for you have died, Huck, but no more.

The time I was closer to the island. A small cool breeze started to blow, and that was like saying the night was almost over. I row one more time with the oar and brought it to the shore; so i took my gun and went to the edge of the forest. I sat there on a log and looked through the leaves. I could see the moon come out, and darkness begins to cover the river. But before long I see something about the crowns of the trees, and knew the day was coming. So I grabbed my gun and ran to where I had gone before through the campfire, stopping every minute or so. two to listen. But I was unlucky; I couldn't find the place. But little by little, sure enough, I caught a glimpse of fire among the trees. I went, cautious and slow. Little by little I got close enough to take a look, and there was a man fallen to the ground. It gives me chills. He had a blanket around his head, and his head was almost on fire. I sat behind a thicket of bushes about a feet away from him, and kept my eyes steady looking at him. Daylight was getting gray now. Then he flung open and stretched and got out of the blanket, and it was the Jim of the MS. Watson! I bet I was happy to see you. I say:

“Hello, Jim!” and goes out to greet him.

He jumped up and looked at me wildly. Then he knelt down, gathered the hands and said:

“Don't hurt me, no! I never did any harm. I always liked people dead, and I did all I could for them. You won't hurt that old Jim, no go?

Well, it didn't take me long to explain that I wasn't dead. I was always so happy see Jim. I wasn't lonely now. I told him I wasn't afraid of him talking to the people where I was. I talked, but he just sat there and looked for me; without saying anything. So I say:

a beautiful encampment in the dense forest. I made a kind of tent with my blankets to put my stuff under so the rain wouldn't get them wet.
I caught a catfish and cut it with my saw, and at the end of the day I lit the fire and I had dinner. So I set up a line to catch some fish for breakfast at the next day.

When it got dark, I sat by the campfire, smoking, very satisfied; but gradually I got a little lonely, so I went and sat on the shore and listened to the stream, and I counted the stars, watched the logs and rafts descending the river, and so I went to bed; there is no better way to pass the time than sleep, when you are alone; but, you can't stay like that, you soon get over it.

And so for three days and three nights. No difference, just the same as usual.
But the next day I went to explore the island. I loved it; everything belonged to me, and I wanted know all about it; but mostly I wanted to give it time. I found many strawberries, ripe; and summer sour grapes and unripe raspberries; and the blackberries greens began to appear. Everyone would be most welcome, I thought.

Well, I was playing in the woods while I wasn't far from the foot of the island. I I had my gun, but I hadn't shot anything; it was just for protection; I thought about killing something close to home. About this time I almost stepped on into a giant snake, and she was slithering through the grass and flowers, and I followed after her, trying to shoot her. I moved on and all of a sudden I found a bonfire of camp that was still smoking.

My heart jumped between my lungs. I didn't expect to get this far, but I unlocked my gun and tiptoed back as fast as I could. From time to when I stopped and tried to listen between the thick leaves and still looked terribly still. He was lying on the corner. Little by little, he half rose and listened, his head cocked to the side. He said, very low:

“Tramp – tramp – tramp; this is death; vagabond - vagabond - tramp; they are coming after me; but I'm not going. Oh, they're here! not me touch - no! Take your hand off me – they are so cold; release. Oh, let this poor man devil at peace!”

Then he dropped to all fours and crawled, begging them to leave him alone, and he hid in his blanket and hid under the old pine table, still begging; and then he started to cry. I could hear them through the blanket.

Gradually he rolled over and got up on his feet looking wild, and he saw me and went behind me. He chased me around with a switchblade, calling the Angel of Death and saying it would kill me, and so I had to stop disturbs him. I begged and told him it was just Huck; but he laughed so loudly, and roared and swore, and kept chasing me. When I turned around and dodged underneath by the arm he grabbed me and grabbed me by the jacket, and I thought it was over for me; but I managed to escape and took off my jacket as fast as lightning, and saved myself.
Soon he was tired, and he fell with his back against the door, and said he was going to rest.
a little and then it would kill me. He put the knife under him, and said he would sleep to regain strength, and then he would see who was better than who.

Then he dozed off very quickly. Gradually I managed to pick up the old chair and I got up as gently as I could, so as not to make any noise, and lowered the gun. I took the stick to make sure it was loaded, then put it over the keg of turnip, pointing at Dad, and I sat behind him to wait for him to move. AND time passed very slowly.

so now he gave a howl that made the hairs on his body stand on end, and then he descended into the earth, and there he rolled, and held his toes; the curses he made, in then surpassed every other time he did it. According to himself. he had heard old Sowberry Hagan in his better days, and said he was so much better than him also; but that was a bit of an exaggeration, perhaps.

After dinner, Dad took the pitcher and said he had enough whiskey for two drunk and a tremendous delirium. That was always your word. I found that in less than one minute he'd be drunk, and as soon as he was, I'd steal the key, or leave, or one or another. He drank and drank, and little by little he fell into his blankets; but luck didn't go my way. He didn't sleep soundly, he was restless in his sleep. He groaned and groaned and thrashed from side to side for a long time. Finally, I got so sleepy I couldn't keep my eyes open, and before I could realize I was already fast asleep and the candle was lit.

I don't know how long I slept, but all of a sudden I heard a horrible scream and then I woke up. Dad was looking like a wild animal, jumping around and screaming. He said snakes were climbing up his legs; and then he would jump up and screamed, and said that something had bitten him on the cheek - but I couldn't see no snake. He started running around the cabin, yelling “Take him! take it off! he is biting me on the neck!” I've never seen a man look so wild in his eyes. Soon he was all exhausted and collapsed, panting; then he rolled up and down down really fast, kicking things all over the place, and hitting and grabbing the air with his hands, screaming and saying that there were demons holding him. he wore out little by little, and stood still for a while, groaning. Then he got quieter, and didn't made no sound. I could hear the owls and the wolves in the forest

I thought I'd make it out that night if Dad got drunk enough, and I figured so. I was so immersed in this thought that I didn't realize how long I stayed, until the old man yelled and asked me if I was sleeping or doing what?

I took all the things to the cabin in the meantime it was dark. While I dinner, the old man took a sip or two, warmed up, and went back to eating. He was drunk in the city, lay in the gutter all night, and he became a entertainment to watch. One might think it was Adam, he was just a trash. Whenever his drink started working, he almost always went to the government.
at the time he says:

“Call it government! why, just look at it and see what it's like. here is the law ready to take from men their children, a man's own son, which he had problems, anxiety and expense to create. Yes, when man finishes creating his son, and is ready to work and finally has time to think about him, and have some rest, the law goes and goes for him. And they call that government! This is not everything. THE law supports that old man, Judge Thatcher, and helps him keep me out of my own property. Here's what the law does: The law takes a man worth six thousand dollars or any more, and throws him in a damn shack like this, and lets him walk around in clothes that are not even worthy of a pig. They call it government! a man cannot have their rights in a government like this. Sometimes I have a strong sense of leave the country forever and all. Yes, and I told them so; I said that to Thatcher in his face. Many of them have heard me and can confirm that I really said it. I say, for two cents I'd leave this motherfucking country never again would get close to him again. It's the words themselves. I say look at mine hat - if you call it a hat - but the cap goes up and the rest goes down until it's below my chin, and so it's not really a hat, but more like my head be pushed

job. There was an old horse blanket nailed to the logs in the corner of the cabin.
behind the table, to keep the wind from blowing through the cracks and blowing out the candles. I was under the table, lifted the blanket, and went to work sawing a large log - big enough to let me through. Well, it was a good long job, but I I was nearing the end when I heard Dad's gun go off in the woods. got rid of the signs of my work, I dropped the blanket and hid my saw, and soon Dad arrived.

Dad wasn't in a good mood – so he was as usual. He said that I was downtown, and everything was going wrong. His lawyer said he
I thought I would win the case and get the money if they started the judgment; but there were ways to put it off for a long time, and Judge Thatcher knew how do that. And he said the people allowed there to be another trial for take me from him and give me back to the widow as my guardian, and they thought would win this time. This shook me up considerably, because I didn't want to go back to the widow's house and be as straight and civil as they called it. Then the old man started to curse, and cursed everything and everyone he could think of, and then cursed all over again to make sure he hadn't jumped anyone, and after that he ended with a kind of general name-calling, including a considerable portion of people he didn't know the names of, and so he called them so-and-so when he arrived
up to them, and continued with his curses.

He said he'd love to see the widow get me. He said he would be careful, and if they tried to do anything to him, he knew from a place about ten to eleven miles away to hide, where they could search until I dropped and they wouldn't find me. This made me quite uncomfortable again, but just for a minute; I thought I wouldn't be available until he had that chance.

job. There was an old horse blanket nailed to the logs in the corner of the cabin.
behind the table, to keep the wind from blowing through the cracks and blowing out the candles. I was under the table, lifted the blanket, and went to work sawing a large log - big enough to let me through. Well, it was a good long job, but I I was nearing the end when I heard Dad's gun go off in the woods. got rid of the signs of my work, I dropped the blanket and hid my saw, and soon Dad arrived.

Dad wasn't in a good mood – so he was as usual. He said that I was downtown, and everything was going wrong. His lawyer said he
I thought I would win the case and get the money if they started the judgment; but there were ways to put it off for a long time, and Judge Thatcher knew how do that. And he said the people allowed there to be another trial for take me from him and give me back to the widow as my guardian, and they thought would win this time. This shook me up considerably, because I didn't want to go back to the widow's house and be as straight and civil as they called it. Then the old man started to curse, and cursed everything and everyone he could think of, and then cursed
all over again to make sure he hadn't jumped anyone, and after that he ended with a kind of general name-calling, including a considerable portion of
people he didn't know the names of, and so he called them so-and-so when he arrived
up to them, and continued with his curses.

He said he'd love to see the widow get me. He said he would be careful, and if they tried to do anything to him, he knew from a place about ten to eleven miles away to hide, where they could search until I dropped and they wouldn't find me. This made me quite uncomfortable again, but just for a minute; I thought I wouldn't be available until he had that chance.

about that school, if I didn't stop talking about it, he would lie with me and to lick.
The next day, he was drunk, went to Judge Thatcher's house and cursed at him and tried to make him give up the money; but he could not, and so he swore that he would make the law enforce it.

it.

The judge and the widow went to court so that the court would take me away from him and leave a theirs to be my guardian; but it was a new judge who had just arrived, and he didn't knew the old man; then he said that the courts should not interfere and separate the families, which can be avoided; said that he would rather not take a child away from the father. Then the Judge Thatcher and the widow had to withdraw.

This pleased the old man very much. He said he'd hide me until I was lost if I didn't make some money for him. I borrowed three dollars from Judge Thatcher, and Dad stole it and got drunk, and left cursing and screaming; and he kept doing it all over town, with a tin pot, until almost midnight; so they the arrested him, and the next day they brought him before the court, and arrested him again for a week. But he said he was satisfied; said that he was in charge of his own son, and he would make it warm for him.

When he left, the new judge said he was going to make a man out of him. So he took him to his own house, and gave him new clothes, and made him eat breakfast, dinner, and supper with his wife.
family. And after dinner he talked to him about self control and stuff like that until the old man wept, and said he had been a fool, and had been wrong all his life; but now he would turn the page and be a man no one would be ashamed of, and I hoped that the judge would help him with that, and not despise him. The judge said I could hug him for those incredible words; then he wept, and his wife wept again; daddy said that he had been a man

it was white; not like another man's white, but a white to make a body sick, a white to make the flesh of the body shiver - a white with a frog, a white as the belly of a fish. As for her clothes – just rags, that was all.
He stands with one ankle resting on the other knee; the boot of that foot was spoiled, and two of his fingers got stuck, and he wiggled them from time to time. Your hat was lying on the floor - very old and unkempt with the top sunken, like a lid.

I kept looking at him; he was sitting there looking at me, with his chair a slightly tilted back. I lowered the sail. I noticed that the window was up; then he had approached the shed. He kept looking me up and down. To the few he says:

“Very starched clothes. You think it's one of the best, don't you?
“Maybe I am, maybe I'm not,” I say.

“You didn't give me any kisses,” he says. “You won many beautiful ones while been gone. I'll take you downstairs before I'm done with you. You too polite, they talk – can read and write. You think you're better than your father now, isn't it, why can't he read and write? I will take it from you. who told you that you can butt in, huh? – who said you could?
"The widow. She told me."
“The widow, huh? – and who told the widow she could get her hands on something that isn't it hers?"
"Nobody said anything to her."
“Well, I'll teach you how to butt in. And look here – you will drop this school, he heard? I'm going to learn from people how to raise a boy, put yourself above the his own father and let him be better than his own father. And I see you in that school again, hear? Her mother couldn't read, and she couldn't write, before to die. None of the family learned to read and write before they died. I do not I can; and here you are finding yourself it was as big as two or three rooms put together, and Jim could stand on it. He was nice in there. Jim was supposed to have put our traps there right away, but I said we didn't want to go up and down there all the time.

Jim said that if we had the canoe hidden in a good spot, and we had all the traps in the cave, we could run there if anyone came to the island, and they never would find us without dogs, to sniff us. And besides, he said that the birds they said it was going to rain, and I wanted things to get wet?

So we went back and got the canoe, rowed to the cave and loaded all the traps there. So we looked for a place close by, among the thick willows, to hide the canoe. We took some fish out of the nets and cast it again, and We started getting ready for dinner.

The cave door was big enough to roll a barrel, and on one side of the door the floor came out of the ground a bit, it was flat and a good place to light a fire. So we built and prepared dinner.

We spread out blankets and a rug and had dinner. We put all the others things at the bottom of the cave by hand. Soon it got dark and began to thunder and lightning; so the birds were right. Immediately it started to rain, and it rained a lot. I've never seen a wind blow like that. It was one of those summer storms. It would be so dark that the whole outside would be dark, and beautiful; and the rain hit so hard strong that the most distant trees looked like cobwebs; and out of nowhere came a gust of wind that would bend the trees and lift the pale undersides of the leaves; and then, when very blue and black – fst! It was as bright as glory, and you would have one small glimpse of the fading treetops going to school, it was getting easier and easier. I was getting used to the widow's way too, and they warn me not to be so hard on myself. To live in a house and sleeping in a bed was very good for me, but before that I I used to sleep in the woods sometimes so this was a break for me. I I liked the old way better, but over time, I started to like the new ones too, a little. The widow said I was going slowly but very well. She said no was ashamed of me.

One morning I happened to look for the salt shaker for breakfast. I took some of it as fast as I could, I threw salt over my left shoulder to avoid bad luck, but Miss. Watson was in front of me and ignored it. She says, "Take your hands off, Huckleberry; what a mess you are always making!" The widow gave a good sermon in me, but that warning wouldn't ward off bad luck, I knew that well. I left after breakfast morning, feeling worried and shaky, and wondering where it was going happen and what would happen. There are ways to avoid some types of bad luck, but this was not one of them; so I didn't try to do anything, I just kept getting discouraged and alert.

I went down to the front yard and tripped over the step where you can go through the fence. high of boards. There were a few inches of new snow on the ground, and I saw the tracks of somebody. They had come from the quarry and had been standing around the wall for some time. time, and then continued around the garden fence. It was funny that they didn't had found me after staying there. I could not understand. it was very weird. I was going to follow him, but I bent down to check the tracks first. I did not notice nothing at first, but then I realized. There was a cross on the heel of the left boot made with big nails, to ward off the devil.